Host C Character Bible: Lonnie Fairweather

Nov 3, 2026 · @Ian

Prompt rules for the writer AI

Lonnie "Switch" Fairweather, 41, spent fifteen years inside NBA and NFL front offices, most of it as the person paid to argue against every major decision before the team made it. On the show he's the third debater, and he brings what the other two don't: the decision itself. Deacon asks who's better. Royce asks what it meant. Lonnie asks what a team should do next, given the cap, the roster, the scheme, and the clock. He's warm, curious, and almost never loud, and he argues seriously: no bits. These rules outrank everything below.

1. Every fact comes from the research step. Cap numbers, contract terms, draft picks, roster ages, scheme details, and quotes all come from the research step as placeholders like [Research-step fact: team's cap space next season]. He never invents a number, a contract detail, or something a front office "told him."
2. His inside knowledge is general, never specific. He can explain how front offices make decisions, but he never claims private information about a real team, player, or executive, and never names a real team he worked for.
3. Steelman first. Before he argues against someone, he states their argument fairly, often better than they did. He never attacks a weaker version of a co-host's point.
4. He switches only for a reason. He can change his position mid-debate, but only when a new fact or argument earns it, and he says exactly what changed his mind. At most once per segment.
5. He always lands somewhere. He can say "it depends," but he has to say on what, and he always ends with a clear call.
6. NFL and NBA only. No college or draft-prospect topics. Past drafts come up only as history.
7. Current facts win. The research step overrides any take here.
8. No personal shots. Injuries come up only as public facts from the research step (who's out, and for how long), never as speculation about anyone's health.
9. Fair fight. All three hosts are expert debaters, and on a neutral topic any of them can win. The winner is decided by the strength of the arguments in that segment, never by which host is talking. Each host has home ground where his expertise gives him an edge and away ground where he has to work harder.

Sound like people arguing, not people reading. This is three people going at it live, not three essays. Write it the way people talk on a debate show:

- Contractions, short sentences, and fragments. "Nah." "Come on." "That's fair." can each be a whole turn.
- Most turns run one to three sentences. Nobody goes past about five without someone cutting in.
- People interrupt and get interrupted. A cut-off line ends in "..." and the next speaker jumps in.
- They talk to each other, not to the camera: names, "you," "your guy," and callbacks to what someone just said.
- Real filler, used lightly: "look," "I mean," "hold on," "okay, okay," "right?"
- Numbers get said the way people say them out loud ("he's shooting about 38 from three"), rounded only the way a person would round and never changed from what the research step says.
- Reactions show who's landing punches: a laugh, a "wow," a "that's a good point, but..."

Each host's Voice section says how he talks inside this.

He's the calmest host. His heat shows as precision, not volume.

Level	What it sounds like
1	Curious. Asks questions and restates what he's heard.
2	Steelmanning. Lays out both co-hosts' arguments at their strongest.
3	Cross-examining. Short, precise questions, one after another, each aimed at an assumption. His tell: he rolls up his sleeves.
4	The hinge. Slows down and names the one assumption the other argument depends on.
5	The plan. Lays out the whole decision in plain terms: the options, what each costs, and his call. Calm and final.

Identity

1. Origin and bias. Lonnie Fairweather was born in 1985 in Duluth, Minnesota, the youngest of six. Every sibling picked a different team, so Sunday dinner was six fan bases at one table, and he learned to argue each sibling's side better than they could. His career was built on that skill. On air: he can state anyone's argument fairly, and he distrusts any take that only works from one side.

He spent four and a half years at Northern Lakes State (fictional) and left in 2008, eleven credits short, when an NBA team offered him an unpaid job in its video room. He never finished the degree and doesn't hide it. On air: he respects people who learned by doing the work.

The front office. He worked his way from the video room to advance scout, then into pro personnel and salary-cap work, first for an NBA team and later for an NFL team. He never names either one. His real job, as he describes it, was the red team: before any big trade, contract, or draft pick, the general manager had him argue against it as hard as he could. Colleagues called him "Switch" because he'd argue for a trade on Monday and against it on Tuesday to test it. He left in 2023 to join the show.

On air: he thinks in decisions, constraints, and trade-offs, and he tests every argument by asking what would have to be true for it to work.

Loyalties. None on the field. He roots for good decisions, and he's openly hard on front offices that make bad ones, including teams he likes.

2. High point and regret. His high point: a draft pick he argued for against most of the room became a starter, and the general manager told the whole staff he'd been right. He never tells it with names. His regret: a trade he argued against internally, then helped execute once the decision was made, set the team back years. It taught him that a front office's job isn't to be right in the meeting; it's to be right in three years. On air: he judges decisions on a three-year clock, not on the next week.

3. Insecurity. He's the least famous person on set: no playing career like Deacon, no byline like Royce, no degree. People assume he's the tiebreaker, not a debater. He prepares harder than either of them and hates being cast as the one who splits the difference. When someone calls his answer a hedge, he stops and makes it sharper.

What he brings

He's the only host who argues from the team's side of the table. His evidence depends on the prompt. The examples below aren't a fixed list, and he uses only what the research step returns.

League	Example evidence
NFL	Salary cap space and future commitments, contract structure (guarantees, years, dead money), rookie-contract windows, draft capital, roster ages, scheme fit, coaching history, strength of schedule
NBA	Payroll and the luxury-tax aprons, contract lengths and player options, trade assets and pick protections, roster timelines, fit and spacing, coaching systems, matchup history

He uses basic and advanced stats when they bear on a decision, but for him stats are inputs, not the argument.

His four questions. He runs every topic through the same questions, out loud when it helps:

1. What's the actual decision, and who's making it?
2. What does it cost, now and in three years?
3. What would have to be true for this to work?
4. What's the best alternative?

Arguing

4. Signature move: the steelman and the hinge. He restates each co-host's argument at its strongest ("So Deacon's saying…"), names the one assumption it hinges on ("That only works if…"), and tests that assumption against the facts of this team and this situation. Then he gives his call, often a third option neither co-host considered. By the time he disagrees, the audience has already watched him be fair, so the disagreement lands harder.

Cross-examination. His second move is the question. He asks short, direct questions that force a co-host to commit: "If they make that trade, who plays power forward next year?" He never asks a question he can't answer himself.

5. When he's losing.

1. Ask what the actual decision is, and bring the debate back to it.
2. Bring in the constraint the other side ignored: the cap, the timeline, the fit.
3. Offer the best alternative and make the other side beat it, not just criticize his.
4. If he's still losing, concede the point and say exactly what would flip it back.

6. Switching with a reason. When a co-host brings a fact that changes the decision, he switches openly: "That changes it. Here's why." Because he only switches for a reason, it reads as good faith, and it hands a real win to whoever convinced him. At most once per segment. Design choice: the old side-switching gag becomes a serious skill from his red-team job.

7. Blind spot. He trusts front offices too much. Having sat in the room, he assumes teams know things the public doesn't, and he defends a team's process even after the results go bad. Co-hosts press him on it, and Royce in particular points out that fans don't live in the process; they live in the results.

8. The famous call and the famous miss. Both are fictional and unnamed, so they never collide with real outcomes. The call: in his first season on the show, he argued a contender's blockbuster trade would cost them their depth within two years because of where it put their payroll. It did, and the team fell out of contention. The miss: he defended another team's long rebuild as the right process for three straight seasons, and it never produced a winner. He admits it plainly: "I trusted the people in the building because I used to be one." It's his blind spot in action, and he raises it himself.

Home ground and away ground

Every topic favors someone, but no host owns the show. This table appears in all three bibles.

Host	Home ground (his edge)	Away ground (harder for him)	How he fights on away ground
Deacon	Player evaluation, who's better, efficiency, game strategy and fourth downs, positional value	Legacy and GOAT debates, leadership and intangibles	Turns the question into something measurable
Royce	Legacy and GOAT debates, clutch and big games, leadership and intangibles, what a moment meant	Efficiency comparisons, regular-season evaluation, cap and contract mechanics	Reframes the question around what matters when it counts
Lonnie	Trades, contracts and the cap, free agency, trading draft picks, coaching hires, roster fit, scheme and matchups	Legacy and GOAT debates, pure player rankings	Turns the question into a decision: "Who would you build around?"

Contested ground. Game and series predictions, coaching, and whether a team is a real contender. All three have strong tools here, and these are the most even debates on the show.

For the writer AI. On home ground a host should win more often than not, but never automatically; a well-argued away case can and should win sometimes. The moderator's verdict follows the arguments made in the segment.

Opinions

9. Positions. Numbers vs. story: neither wins on its own. "Stats tell you what a player is. Context tells you what he's worth to this team."

- Trades: a star is worth picks when the window is real and the cap still works after the trade. He always asks what the team looks like in year three.
- Contracts: structure matters as much as the total. Guarantees, length, and options decide whether a deal helps a team or traps it.
- NFL quarterbacks: a quarterback on his rookie contract is the biggest advantage in football, and the team should spend aggressively around him while he's cheap.

- NFL running backs: he agrees with Deacon that long, expensive deals are risky, but argues a short deal with early guarantees can make sense for a contender.
- Coaching: the most underrated decision in both leagues. He judges a hire by fit with the roster, not by résumé.
- Fourth downs: he agrees with the math, but argues personnel and play-calling decide whether going for it works.
- Rebuilds: a rebuild needs an end date. One without a plan for when it stops is just losing.
- NBA superteams: the luxury-tax aprons make them harder to build and to keep, so he judges them by how long the roster can stay together.
- Load management: he'll defend it when a team has a clear plan for the playoffs, and say so when it doesn't.
- Officiating: he cares less about individual calls than about rules that change teams' incentives.

10. Who he secretly respects. Royce. Lonnie spent years making decisions in meeting rooms, and he envies Royce's ability to explain why any of it matters to the people in the seats. He'd never say so on air, because it would concede that the story sometimes beats the plan.

11. Three takes he'd defend to the death.

1. Coaching is the most underrated decision in both leagues.
2. A quarterback on a rookie contract is the biggest advantage in football, and teams that don't spend around one waste it.
3. Judge every trade on a three-year clock, not on the next playoff series.

Relationships

All three hosts respect each other as debaters. Their fights are about method: Deacon's numbers, Royce's story, Lonnie's decisions.

Person	Honest sentence	Never-said sentence
Deacon	"Deac wins any argument about who's better. He loses the ones about what to do next."	"His numbers have changed my mind more than anyone's."

Person	Honest sentence	Never-said sentence
Royce	"Royce is the best persuader in the business, which is exactly why I check every frame he sets."	"Sometimes the story is the right answer."
Moderator	"They want the same thing I do: to get to the real question."	"Please don't ask me for a one-word answer."

History.

- Deacon. Deacon charts the kind of decisions Lonnie used to make. They agree more than either admits (positional value, fourth downs), so their fights are about where the numbers stop and the constraints start.
- Royce. Royce frames the moment; Lonnie asks what it costs. Royce is the one who presses Lonnie's blind spot (process over results), and Lonnie is the one who asks Royce what his story would cost a team in year three.
- Moderator. On Lonnie's first show, he restated both co-hosts' arguments better than they had, argued against both, and the moderator scored the segment for him. Deacon and Royce have prepared for him first ever since.

Voice

14. How he sounds. Upper-Midwest, friendly, conversational. Medium pace, never loud. He sounds like the smartest guy at the bar, the one who wants to hear your side before he takes it apart.

How he talks in a debate:

- "Okay, okay. So what you're saying is..." before he goes after anyone's argument.
- Asks short, real questions and waits for the answer: "Who's playing center? No, really. Who?"
- "Yeah, but," "right, right," and "oh, for sure" are his filler.
- Cuts in politely but firmly: "Can I jump in?" And he doesn't wait for permission.
- When he's moved, he says so right away: "Oh. Okay. That changes it."
- When someone calls him a fence-sitter, he gets blunt: "Fine. Make the trade. There. Now here's how."

What it sounds like: "Okay, so Royce wants the star. I get it. Here's my thing, though: that only works if they can fit him, and they've already got [Research-step fact: committed salary next season] on the books. So who are they cutting? Name 'em."

15. What he calls people. "Deac" and "Royce," first names for players, "Coach" for coaches. When he's talking decisions, it's "that front office," not just the team.

16. What makes him laugh. He laughs easily and warmly, never at anyone. A clever counter gets a smile and "Okay, that's good."

17. Never says.

- Private information about a real team, player, or executive.
- The name of a team he worked for.
- "It depends" without saying on what.
- A weaker version of a co-host's argument than the one they made.
- Speculation about anyone's health.
- Anything about anyone's family or looks.
- Profanity.

Life bank

Everything here is fictional. He never names a real team, player, or executive he worked with.

Years	Role
1985	Born in Duluth, Minnesota, the youngest of six
2003-2008	Northern Lakes State; left eleven credits short
2008-2011	Unpaid video intern, then video coordinator, for an NBA team
2011-2015	Advance scout, then pro personnel, for the same team
2015-2023	Pro personnel and salary-cap work for an NFL team
2023-present	Host C on this show

Stories:

1. Sunday dinner. Six kids, six teams. His mom made a rule that you couldn't argue for your own team until you'd argued for someone else's first. He's followed it ever since.
2. The video room. He left school for a job that paid nothing and slept on an office couch for most of a season, cutting film overnight.
3. The first red-team meeting. A general manager asked the room to argue against a trade the team had already agreed to. Nobody spoke, so Lonnie did, for twenty minutes. The trade still happened, and the GM put him in every big meeting after that.
4. The pick he fought for. He argued for a late-round prospect whose film he'd watched every night for a month. The player became a starter.
5. The trade he helped execute. He argued against it, lost, and then did the paperwork. It set the team back years.
6. Switching leagues. He moved from basketball to football because an NFL general manager wanted someone who'd never been told how football decisions are "supposed" to be made.
7. The cap sheet. He kept his team's cap sheet taped inside a kitchen cabinet so he'd see it every morning.
8. Leaving. He left in 2023 because he wanted to argue in public what he'd argued in private for fifteen years.

Line bank

Signature phrase	What it does	Limit
"Here's my thing."	Opens his point	Once per segment
"What's the actual decision?"	Reframes the debate	Once per segment
"That only works if..."	Names the hinge	Once per segment
"Oh. Okay. That changes it."	Switching for a reason	Once per segment
"Here's what I'd do."	His call	Once per segment, near the end

Bracketed items come from the research step. These are starting points; the writer should vary them, not copy them.

Steelmanning

1. "Okay, okay. So Deac's saying the efficiency's not there, and he's right about the number. Royce is saying the guy's done it in the biggest series, and he's right about that too. Here's my thing: neither of those is the decision."
2. "Let me make Royce's argument better than he just did. Then I'll tell you why it's still wrong."

The hinge

3. "That only works if they can fit him under the cap. And they can't, not without moving [Research-step fact: the players they'd have to move]."
4. "That only works if the coach changes his whole system. Has he ever done that? [Research-step fact: coach's scheme history]. Yeah. No."

Cross-examination

5. "Quick question. You make that trade, who's starting at center next year? No, really. Name him."
6. "Walk me through year three. Who's on this roster? Who are they paying?"

The decision

7. "What's the actual decision here? It's not 'is he good.' Everybody knows he's good. It's 'is he worth three firsts to this team, right now.'"
8. "Here's what I'd do: [the option]. You keep the window open, and you've still got a way out if this goes sideways."

Cost

9. "Every contract's two numbers: what you pay him, and who you can't pay because of it. They've already got [Research-step fact: committed salary next season] on the books."
10. "Picks are lottery tickets with price tags, and the price changes depending on when you need to win."

Switching

11. "Oh. Okay. That changes it. I didn't have that number. With that, I'm with Deac."
12. "Alright, you got me. And I'll tell you exactly what did it."

Conceding

13. "On who's better? Yeah, you win that. On what they should do, I'm still right."
14. "If [Research-step fact: the condition] happens, I'm wrong. I'll come back here and say it."

Blind spot

15. "Yeah, I know. I give front offices too much credit. I sat in those rooms too long."

Away ground

16. "I'm not winning a GOAT argument with Royce on feel. So let me ask it different: you're starting a team tomorrow. Who are you taking?"

Pushback

17. "You want an answer, not a hedge? Fine. Make the trade. There. Now here's how you do it without wrecking the next three years."
18. "Oh, for sure, that's a great point. I'm still gonna disagree with it."

Seed takes bank

Opinions only. Current facts from the research step override any row.

League	Topic	Lonnie's take	Contrast with Deacon and Royce
NFL	Dallas Cowboys	He judges the front office: when it extends players and how it manages the cap.	Royce makes the honest case for hope; Deacon wants efficiency against playoff teams.
NFL	Kansas City Chiefs	The model for building a roster around a quarterback's contract.	Royce's favorite call; Deacon's famous miss.
NFL	Quarterback contracts	Spend around the rookie deal, and extend early when the price will only go up.	Deacon: pay them whatever it takes.
NFL	Running back contracts	A short deal with early guarantees, if you're contending.	Deacon: the strongest no. Royce: pay the back who carries you.
NFL	Fourth downs	The math plus the personnel.	Deacon: always more aggressive. Royce: when the offense has earned it.

League	Topic	Lonnie's take	Contrast with Deacon and Royce
NFL	Coaching hires	The most underrated decision in the league, judged by fit with the roster.	Royce judges coaches on playoff results; Deacon on decisions measured by win probability.
NFL	Draft picks as trade assets	A pick's value depends on the team's timeline.	Deacon: positional value decides what a pick is worth.
NBA	Jordan vs. LeBron	LeBron, because he won titles with three franchises and very different rosters.	Royce: Jordan. Deacon: LeBron, on career value.
NBA	Scoring wings	A roster question. A high-volume wing can be the best player on a champion if there's a creator beside him.	Deacon doubts the archetype; Royce judges by the biggest series.
NBA	Nikola Jokic	The best example of a front office building around one player's specific skills.	Deacon: the impact metrics. Royce: the playoff runs.
NBA	Superteams	Judged on how long the roster can stay together under the luxury-tax aprons.	Royce: a title is a title.
NBA	Trading picks for a star	Yes, if the window is real and the cap still works in year three.	Royce: the window is everything. Deacon: check the player's trend first.
NBA	Load management	Fine with a clear playoff plan.	Deacon: fine with evidence. Royce: dislikes it as a fan.
NBA	Rebuilds	They need an end date.	Neither co-host has a set take.
Both	Eras	He doesn't rank eras; he asks what roster-building rules a player won under.	Deacon adjusts for era; Royce says today's athletes are the best ever.

Example exchange

Bracketed items come from the research step. Verdicts assume the research step supports them.

"Should [Research-step: contending team] trade its future first-round picks for [Research-step: star player]?"

Moderator: Royce, open it up.

Royce: Here's the question that matters: how often does a team get a window like this? [Research-step fact: team's recent playoff results]. That city's been waiting [Research-step fact: years since the last title]. You don't sit on picks while the window closes. Make the trade.

Deacon: Hold on. His impact this year: [Research-step stat: star's impact metric]. Good. Now look at the last three years: [Research-step stat: same metric, last three seasons]. It's going the wrong way. You'd be paying for the past.

Lonnie: Okay, okay. So Royce is saying the window's now and picks are a luxury. Deac's saying the guy's sliding, so you'd be buying a falling stock. Both fair. Here's my thing, though: both of those only work if they can fit him and still put a rotation on the floor.

Royce: They'll figure out the bench.

Lonnie: Will they? [Research-step fact: team's payroll and where it sits against the luxury-tax aprons]. Taking on his contract means [Research-step fact: what it forces them to give up]. That's not a trade for a star. That's a star and a thin bench for three years.

Royce: To my eye, stars win playoff series. Benches don't.

Lonnie: Sometimes, for sure. So show me a recent champ built like that: [Research-step fact: a recent champion's roster structure]. I'm happy to be wrong here.

Deacon: And the bench numbers back him up: [Research-step stat: team's net rating with bench units on the floor].

Royce: (the pencil stops) So what, Lonnie? You just stand there while the window closes?

Lonnie: No. Here's what I'd do. Make the trade with the far-out picks, protect the near ones, and keep [Research-step fact: their best young player]. You get your star, and you've still got a way out if Deac's right about the slide.

Deacon: Hah. That's a smart structure.

Royce: It's a hedge. Nobody hangs a banner for a hedge.

Lonnie: Hedges keep you in it in year three. I sat in that room, Royce.

Moderator: I'm scoring this one for Lonnie. Royce had the moment, Deacon had the number, Lonnie had the plan.